Prices at the pump

Drill here, drill now! isn't heard quite as often when gasoline pump prices have dropped sixty cents in less than a month.

The shrill screeching for energy independence takes a dive into silence when gas prices drop. Remember, we've lived through the uncertainty of foreign oil supply for at least 35 years. In 1980, the major plank in John Anderson's platform was a fifty cents a gallon tax on gas to head the country toward energy independence. There were lines at the pumps during the Nixon presidency even earlier.

The best way to get attention for a faux concern during a political campaign is to link our imports to our enemies in the Gulf. The fact that little of our oil supply comes from that region does not still the bleating. Gary Trauner favors ending the export of finished petroleum products to our friends and allies around the world.

So, here we go again. Prices at the pump go down, we give up the pursuit to become less reliant on imported oil. OPEC controls the supply and they play the United States like a violin. Raise the prices, lower the prices. And, we shut up.
